Martienssen and the International Style by Gilbert Herbert examines the central role played by Rex Distin Martienssen in the development of a modern South African architecture. In addition, it focuses on the significant developments in the Transvaal in a period extending from the end of World War I to the death of Martienssen in 1942.

Martienssen has made major discoveries relating to the way plants control the expression of their genes. Working with maize , [9] yeast [5] and the weed Arabidopsis , he focuses on the chemical modifications to DNA that determine which genes are active – a process known as epigenetics .

On one of his trips abroad in 1934 he met Le Corbusier, which was to be the start of an enduring friendship. In the same year Martienssen established a practice in Johannesburg, and designed his own home House Martienssen in Greenside - a house quite remarkable even by current standards.

Martienssen and colleagues reported maize methylation patterns in 2013, 4 and a handful of other groups followed with more maize methylomes. These surveys have revealed notable variation in methylation patterns among individuals, but unlike animals, which use epigenetics to regulate the patterns of gene expression in different cell types during development and into adulthood, plants have nearly identical patterns of methylation throughout their tissues.
